This brilliant contribution to African social science presents an original theory of social formations with a new methodological approach. Professor Mafeje critically reviews the works of orthodox anthropologists, questioning the impact on African Studies of both development theory and classical ethnography. Within a context of redefining forms of political organizations, he uses research on the East African Lacustrine Kingdoms to analyze the articulation of the relationship between political and economic power. Arguing that pastoralism and agriculture need not represent different modes of production, but rather socially controlled options within the same mode, he rejects articulation theory and the concept of feudalism. Finally he evaluates the impact of colonial capitalism on different social formations. It is an outstanding theoretical contribution that raises new perspectives on the classic issues of exploitation, class and social change in African societies.

NEWLY RELEASED
CODESRIA BOOK SERIES

The 1960s and most of the 1970s in Algeria were characterized by a mood of success and optimism as stated in "The Algerian Charter". However, this over-all mood altered in the 1980s when the economic crisis triggered a far-reaching social and political change as can be testified by the outstanding October 1988 uprise and the subsequent modifications in the political structure. This book which is written by a multi-disciplinary team of Algerian social scientists brilliantly analyzes the post-independence social transformations in Algeria.

The authors investigate the new development orientations, state disengagement, the changeover from industrialization as "prime mover" of development to deindustrialization, a new agricultural reform, a fundamental restructuring of civil society and its relations with the state - thus marking the end of populism -, so as to portray the deep ongoing changes in Algeria.
